Borrowing Policy

This is the service area of the Suburban Library Cooperative.

Library Cards

Patrons of SLC libraries must register for a library card at their home library. If the card is damaged, lost or stolen, the patron must get a replacement card from his/her home library.

Once a patron has a home library card, any SLC library can renew the card.

Youth

Each SLC member sets its own policy for issuing cards to residents under the age of 18.

Military Personnel

Active duty military personnel and family members living at the same address receive full borrowing privileges. Military personnel can get a card at any SLC library; regardless of the city or county they live in. A military identification card and proof of local residency, as listed below, will be required.

Identification Required

In order to qualify for a library card, patrons must provide the following:

Current Michigan Driver's License with current address	None
Current Michigan State Identification Card with current address	None
Current Driver's License or State Identification with a former mailing address	Utility Bill, Automobile Registration, Rent Receipt, Property Tax Receipt, Mortgage/Closing Statement with current address

Do You Hear What I Hear? How Patron Bashing is Killing Our Spirit

There is no question that anyone working in a public service position will occasionally come across challenging patrons and situations. These instances have the potential to adversely affect subsequent interactions with both the public and fellow co-workers. It can be easy for staff members to gossip, ruminate, and vent afterward, thinking that such behaviors will help clear their minds and reboot their attitudes. The presenters of this session, however, argue that doing so will not only be counter-productive but also poison the library atmosphere for the workers and public alike. Such displaced aggression affects innocent bystanders. I know whenever I hear customer service workers complain about someone they just waited on, it makes me wonder what they are saying about ME after I walk away.

The presenters believe that customer service is a mindset, that we have a choice in how we deal with conflict, and that emotional labor is not a natural consequence of working with the public. The use of stoicism can be very helpful, controlling one's emotions with one's mind and only worrying about things which are in one's control. People tend to believe their situations are worse than they actually are because of negative memory bias; there is a tendency to not remember good or neutral encounters, only the bad ones. Confirmation bias is also used to discolor our perceptions. Finally, group think leads us to want to swap "horror" stories with co-workers that often exhibit tinges of racism, classism, and other harmful stereotypes. The presenters exhaustively researched the topic and concluded that the best way for one to shed a negative feeling is not to fixate on it but to just let it go (cue the song from “Frozen.”) It is entirely up to us to model proper behavior.

Version Control with Git

Git is an example of version control, collaborative software that allows the tracking of changes to code or text based projects. It can be used in a variety of computing systems including Mac, Windows, Linux and Solaris. Version control is open sourced, meaning it is free to download and use. It has many uses, most popular being a way to store and edit documents and computer programs. Git is also used in large website development and as a digital repository for files.

When Git is being used in conjunction with others there is no master copy so a large number of people can have access to the project at the same time in various locations. An example of how Git could be used in a library setting is in the formation of a policy manual. John could be working on the internet use policy, Lynn the dress code, Sharon the borrowing policy, and Oksana the unattended children policy simultaneously from their respective branches. As the project progresses, their current work can be posted to the site and the documents merged into a cohesive work.

All users would then have equal access to view and edit the respective sections, leaving a timestamp of who altered it, when the changes were made, and an explanation why. There would be save points like when playing a video game so that the project would pick up right where it was left off, no having to go back to the beginning. If there were mistakes made and the project becomes “broken,” the document can be rolled back to where the damage occurred. There could also be a staging area where information can be stored before committing it into the document. As you can see, there is great value in having the ability to work on a project in this fashion. If interested, Git can be downloaded at git-scm.com/downloads.

KDL LAB: MAKE SOMETHING!

This presentation was by members of the Kent District Library with eighteen locations around the Grand Rapids area. It described their innovative makerspace program in which a number of themed mobile tubs were purchased, each containing creative activities based on the STEAM initiative (Science, Technology, Engineering, Arts, and Math). Initially set up as a mobile program which could be transported to the various branches, the KDL is now in the process of dedicating permanent space at each branch.

The various tubs are aimed at enticing and drawing in school aged children to the library, particularly the difficult-to-reach teen and tween crowd who often have a lack of programming. They are designed to fulfill what the patrons might WANT to make, not tell them exactly what they HAVE to make. The program fosters creativity, collaboration, tinkering, and gives the patrons free time to explore. Some examples of tub contents/themes are the 3Doodler (a 3D writing pen), the Watercolor Bot (a friendly art robot that moves a paint brush to paint your digital artwork onto paper, using a set of watercolor paints), Robot Rumble, Refashion It (using sewing machines), Design Like da Vinci, Mad Scientist, Little Bits: learn and invent with electronics, and Snap Circuits: fun with simple electronics.

A program like the KDL Lab does not come cheaply. The initial outlay of money (several thousands of dollars) can be prohibitive. It was, in the beginning, funded by grants and donations. But it has been so successful that now they are working the cost of it into their annual budget. Another advantage is that it requires minimal investment of staff time. Finally, the tubs can be individually formatted to each community's relevance. If the space and funding are available, it certainly sounds like something worth looking into.

Making Connections: Using Teen Volunteers to Foster Relationships

Presenter: Stephanie Charlefour, Wixom Public Library

Questions for those who are looking start or expand their current Teen volunteer group:

- What ages do you want in the library? 12 and older? As young as 10? Or case by case?
- Do you need a State of Michigan work permit on file for minor volunteers?
The answer according to the state is yes and Michigan work permits only go as low as 14.
 - Make sure the permit is printed exactly as specified (no staples!) and use the colored paper that the State requires for each age group. Otherwise permit will be rejected and parents will be frustrated.
 - Speak with your Director about the legal items on the permit
 - Save time. The pdf online has fillable fields so fill in the library's information and save the file to make your life easier.
- Do the Teens need to apply for Volunteer positions?
Yes! It teaches real life job skills and gives them the opportunity to treat volunteering seriously.
Also good ideas:
 - Interview teens. You will know if they will be a good fit and again makes them take volunteering seriously.
 - Orientation/Training. With lots of volunteers consider having quarterly orientation. This gives you a chance to outline library policy. Also consider having a training manual to give to teens and sign off on, that way if issues come up, you can direct them back to the manual and policies they acknowledged.
 - Evaluation. Often teens need volunteer hours for something specific and may ask you to write a recommendation letter, evaluations help you keep track of individuals and make letter writing easier.
- Who's responsible for the volunteers? You? Your supervisor? Other library staff? Who will be monitoring them?
Discuss this with your supervisor and all staff. Once the a decision has been made as to whether other staff keeps on eye on volunteers or if volunteers can only get hours in while you are physically at the library, make sure everyone, staff and volunteers, are on the same page about who is to report to whom.

How to recruit Teen Volunteers

- Reach out to National Honor's Societies
- Contact the school's Key clubs and Student Councils
- Word of mouth. Once you get one volunteer, they will tell their friends.
- Foster relationships with teachers

How to Manage Teen Volunteers

- Teens can be dramatic, moody, and are always full of excuses
- Stephanie uses a three strike policy for no show/no call. First time, she explains that she needs those volunteer hours filled for a reason and they agreed to work them. After 3rd no show, she sits down with them and asks if they need to take a break from volunteering.
- Always give them tasks that suit their skills and interests, if they're engaged they will keep coming back.

- Scheduling tips and options:
 - Use sign up Genius
 - Use a shared Google Calendar to share available slots with teens
 - Email your needs - Force the teens to use email! They hate it but tell them they'll need to get used to it for real jobs.
 - Reminder services like email blasts
 - Group text messages

Remember, you only have so much time so volunteer hours are limited. Set boundaries and be firm!

- Favoritism can be a pitfall. Also remember reverse favoritism, too. With teens, always give a second chance.
- Tracking completed hours – You will need to know this for writing those recommendation letters

Everyday Tips

- Greet volunteers by name
- Name tags and lanyards – makes teens feel more official and alerts other staff and patrons to the fact that they are currently volunteering, not just visiting the library on free time
- Have assignments ready to go ahead of time
- Have teens help with library programs:
 - Walk them through entire program; you may have a vision for the program but they may not have any clue what you're thinking.
 - Introduce them to the person in charge of program (if not you) by name so they are sure to go back to that staff member with questions instead of you.

What Stephanie's VolunTeens did this summer:

- Shifted collections
- Decorated for summer reading
- Prepped for programs
- Shelf read
- Wrote Teen tumblr posts
- Created videos for social media
- Audits (i.e. look for items on the missing list!)
- Assist the pages
- Helped seniors and ESL patrons on the computer
- Outreach to the schools. For example, she will send her volunteers to school with printed sticky notes for them to essentially flyer the lockers.

What they did NOT do:

- Check out items
- Manage money
- Clean - She does not like to bore teens (they won't come back otherwise) and doesn't want them to be using chemicals as volunteers

Want to Improve Marketing Efforts? Star with your Employees
Presenter: Rhonda Foxworth, Plaid Fox Marketing

Yes, libraries have little to no money for marketing, but libraries do have staff. Get them excited and engaged and they will provide plenty of marketing just from face to face contact. So use your employees' talents and get them interested in the library and the community.

Engagement is the key as engaged employees bring people in. However that is easier said than done since 70% of American workers are not engaged in their jobs and about 15% are actively disengaged.

How to build brand Ambassadors out of your staff:

- All employees play a role. Back room/technically services just as much as front line staff
- Audit internal communications for consistency (survey staff basically). Usually staff wants more communication on every topic. The more informed everyone is, the more consistent the library's message is.
- Articulate the mission and/or promise statement. Also, shorten your mission statement! If it's too long, staff won't remember.
- Deploy multiple processes to consistently remind everyone of the library's mission values. Small, simple reminders in the meeting minutes or on the library's intranet, private staff facebook page, wikis, blogs, or daily report.
- Use simple tools. Mission statement on T-shirts, library swag, etc. Let the employees embrace it.
- Assess employee knowledge and understanding
- New employees must be trained in the library's mission values. Don't just assume they will pick up the library's culture. Even better, pair them with an employee who is really good at advocating the mission values while training.
- All staff should know how their job affects the patron. We all contribute to patron experience even those in the back room.
- Recognize and reward those who deliver.
- Ask staff for ways to improve.
- Invest in employee wellbeing. This doesn't mean ping pong tables in the breakroom. More engagement contributes to a feeling that their role is important which in turn leads to better wellbeing. That being said, sad/drab/boring break rooms can bring people down. Just make sure employees actually feel that management cares about them.
- Make it easy to share your mission statement.

Empower your staff to live your brand and this will save you money on marketing.

Changing Lives: Connecting Baby Boomers with Assistive Technology
Presenter: Mary Moran, Traverse Area District Library

How to help those who are not digital natives access all the great things available with today's technology can be tough for all librarians. However, those with disabilities, especially visual impairments, can be even more difficult. Boomers with visual impairments are not only learning some digital technology for the first time, but as the technology becomes more touch screen ubiquitous, how does someone who can't see interact with their tech?

Luckily there are more and more assistive technologies to help those with disabilities. Although it can be an extra challenge to teach the blind or deaf patron because of their disability, it can be done.

MLA 2015
Thursday, November 29th
Maren Kroening

As a librarian at the Traverse area's Library for the Blind and Physically Handicapped, Mary focused mostly on tech for those who are visually impaired.

The National Library Service for the Blind has developed their own digital book app for mobile devices, it's called Bard Noble. Publishers are also very good about working with NLS for BPH so now they get bestsellers very quickly. But how do you interact with a touch screen if you can't see?

Both Apple and Android have developed assistive technologies to read a touch screen. Apple's is called "Voice Over" you can use Siri to turn it on if connected to Wi-Fi, otherwise one has to find that setting. Android devices use "Talk Back" and as far as I understand it's a little more difficult to use. Both will speak the name of the app you are touching or allow you to swipe (using a two fingers) through all the apps announcing each's name, then once you've found the app you want, you just double tap to open it. Voice Over can get confused and just keep going sometimes, so use a light 3 finger touch and it will mute the screen reader. Remember, these patrons are aging thus their hearing is going too, so they need to remember to listen well to the voice announcements.

If someone is motivated to learn how to do one thing (example: I really just want to be able to email my grandkids or listen to music) they will have learned quite a few of the gestures and be able to do any of the other tasks on their device. There are also other assistive apps that can be of assistance. One example was a money reader, scan the bill and the voice reader will tell you the denomination. However, they are third party apps so they frequently cost a small fee.

These small touch screens are loved by the blind patrons who use them. Some have complained that screen readers for desktop computers are too frustrating and have too many keyboard commands to memorize. An iPod touch or smart phone is small and portable; patrons can take their talking books or music with them anywhere.

These assistive technologies can give some independence and autonomy to those who have a disability. They can email, communicate with the outside world, and entertain themselves so much easier.

Ignite Sessions

Various Presenters

Presentations of interest were the Tahquamenon Area Library which drastically increased their teen attendance in the library by hosting D&D gaming nights.

Also, there was the Ferndale Library's off-kilter Employee of the Month program which is fun, silly and puts people in the habit of looking for the good in everyone.

The last presentation that interested me was the Chelsea District Library Pages to Pints programing in Bars. They started with a book club in an area microbrewery as a way in, but have moved on to offering fun and excellent, librarian-researched pub trivia games.

Some tips:

- Pick a place that is a cool hang out, not a loud, everyone-is-drunk type bar
- Promote bar programs at the bar, you're looking to engage those young people without kids who don't come into the library, so how are they going to see your flyer if it's only hanging in the library?
- Provide bonus points for showing your library card; it will encourage attendees to stop by the library at least once.
- Use your program to plug other library programs

Michigan Library Association 2015 Annual Conference

Jennifer Lund

First, I'd like to thank the Library Commission for enabling me to attend this year. It is my first public library conference in over 25 years. I have attended a number of law library conferences, but attending this really helped me experience the spirit and dedication of public librarians across the state.

SESSIONS ATTENDED

Opening Keynote (Unshelved) – A humorous look at libraries while reminding us of the library mission – books and reading - buy good books and stay close to core values. Do not put up with bad behavior – take back your authority over patrons who can't follow the rules.

How to Ban a Book (Unshelved) – A facetious look at how patrons can ban books and sneaky ways they can effectively make a book "unavailable". Of course, the point is that no books should be banned if we're buying within our collection development policy and goals.

Reaching Out: Unexpected Community Connections – This program contained a few unique suggestions for program ideas and outreach within the community. I like the idea of pursuing free speakers within police/fire department and have been trying to arrange a program on personal safety issues. Other good ideas were working with local DNR, farmer's markets, historical society, and having teens teach programs.

Legislative Update – This program was interesting in that I was not aware of some of the local tax issues which affect public libraries and how MLA and our lobbying firm work to protect us on these issues.

Elements of Web Communication – We were taught some basic writing skills for web pages and shown some software that we can use to analyze the reading level of our writing. This will help me in writing blurbs for upcoming program flyers and web content.

Booksleuthing: Social Media as a Reader's Advisory Platform – CADL are doing a monthly online program where patrons can get help finding their next great read after listing the 3 last books they read. They get 50-60 requests on average and staff volunteers to work on this and get an answer back to the patron within 60 minutes. It would be fun to try to engage our patrons through Facebook with a program like this.

LibCon 2015: How Three Public Libraries Created a County-Wide ComicCon – Besides the fact that doing a ComicCon or SciFiCon would be a great program for teens, adults, and families, I learned a lot about working with other libraries on a joint program.

Changing Lives: Connecting Baby Boomers with Assistive Technology – This was very informative. We learned and tried to use our phones with blindfolds using Voice Over technology. Not too effective with everyone's phones talking but interesting. We also learned about Library for the Blind resources. These issues will become more prevalent as baby boomers age.

Next Chapter Book Clubs: A Novel Idea - This program is something I want to do with WCV. Next Chapter Books Clubs are for the developmentally disabled. You meet up in a neutral public location once a week and everyone takes turns reading from a book, discussing it as you go. The program requires training with a librarian at Romeo Library and costs $550 but then you are equipped to facilitate and train others to facilitate book groups with developmentally disabled adults. I'm looking into doing this with some groups we've had contact with in Warren and hope to offer this regularly by early next year.

Ignite & Fizzle – Some interesting ideas – one library is doing a pub trivia night as an extension of the book club in a bar idea. I think I like the book discussion in a bar idea better as it is closer to our mission. Other ideas were Staff Ultimate Warrior (elected internally), YALSA shark bowl – creations with a 3-D printer, Geek night lockin for teens. The Fizzle session was a little less interesting to me.

All together the conference was enlightening and it was wonderful to have time to meet and talk with some of my former colleagues and see what they're up to in their libraries. Time well spent. Thank you.
